A Guide to the Epstein Files if You, Like Me, Just Need to Know What Timothée Chalamet Is Doing in There

At the end of January, the Justice Department released its largest batch yet of files related to Jeffrey Epstein, the convicted sex offender whose crimes and connections to the rich and powerful have become one of the most headline-generating and controversy-stirring stories of the second Trump administration. With three million pages of documents, 180,000 photos, and 2,000 videos to comb through, Epstein chroniclers have had their work cut out for them, and you've likely already heard about some of the files' more noteworthy, and sinister, findings.

But the files also contain a lot of miscellaneous information that is not so much as important as it is interesting—I'm talking about things like an email where Soon-Yi Previn called Timothée Chalamet a prick, or another one where Epstein told Deepak Chopra about a rumor involving one of Marla Maples' acquaintances being pervy with her shoes. What a guy! With the understanding that you should seek out the more serious news stories first and that I am a sick individual, I've taken the liberty of rounding up the bits from the most recent Epstein files drop that stood out most to me as a person who processes the world through gossip and famous people (many of whom honestly are innocent parties here). Without further ado, and in alphabetical order ...

Woody Allen

The octogenarian director Allen and his wife, Soon-Yi Previn, who has her own entry below, were neighbors of Epstein in New York, and they frequently corresponded and had dinner together. In 2015, Epstein helped arrange for the two to tour the White House. Though Epstein assumed the Obama administration wouldn't want to be associated with Allen, who was accused of sexually abusing his daughter in the early '90s, White House counsel Kathy Ruemmler invited both members of the couple. (Epstein himself was deemed too risky.) Emails reveal that Epstein spent an exorbitant amount of money on birthday gifts for Allen, including $9,858 for shirts and boxer shorts from Zimmerli, a Swiss luxury underwear brand, as reported by the New York Times. Allen and Previn were also among the many friends to whom Epstein gifted DNA kits.

Tina Brown

Magazine editor and author Brown is on a very short list of people whose reputation was actually enhanced by appearing in the files. As she revealed in her newsletter, publicist and Epstein friend Peggy Siegal (more on her below) tried to get her to attend a dinner for Prince Andrew hosted by Epstein in 2010, to which Allen and Charlie Rose were also invited. "What the fuck is this, Peggy?" Brown remembers screaming at Siegal. "The paedophile's ball?" But despite being present for that interaction, Brown didn't know until this latest release how much scheming Epstein and Siegal were doing behind the scenes in an attempt to "neutralize" her. They never did manage to, and Brown is now getting the last laugh.

Timothée Chalamet

Another person who emerges mostly unscathed: current Best Actor contender Timmy Tim! After Chalamet publicly expressed regret for starring in one of Allen's movies, A Rainy Day in New York, amid #MeToo reconsiderations of Allen's past, Previn apparently held a grudge. She wrote to Epstein in 2018, "I'm glad that prick Chalamet's movie did not get a good review," adding "No I'm not vindictive." In a different email chain, Siegal claimed that her "friend Timothy Chalemet" [sic] didn't want to renounce Allen but was forced to do so by his team. We can probably chalk that up to Siegal being a fierce Allen defender rather than take her word for it.

Deepak Chopra (and Marla Maples)

That aforementioned story about Marla Maples really took the cake—after the author asked Epstein if he knew Maples in one email, he responded that he did, and in fact he lost a $10,000 bet to Donald Trump when she revealed to him that she was pregnant, after which point he sent Trump a "truck of baby food." But Epstein hadn't spoken to her since then, he added, and "she can tell you the story of her friend who was caught having sex with her shoes." According to the Daily Beast, he was most likely referring to a scandal in the '90s that involved Maples' former publicist going on trial for stealing 70 pairs of her shoes, and ... doing other stuff with them, too. For some reason, I am not at all surprised that Epstein likes bringing up this story. In other emails, Chopra and Epstein discussed women—"Did you find me a cute Israeli?," Chopra asks at one point—and trying to get Leonardo DiCaprio in touch with Woody Allen. Chopra has since apologized for his "poor judgment" but denied any wrongdoing.

Stephen Colbert

This one is pretty innocent: As Colbert revealed on The Late Show this week, he discovered that an unidentified friend of Epstein's sent him a clip from Colbert's old show, The Colbert Report. "Well, there's no such thing as bad publicity!" Colbert joked, before sharing a mock-up of a Times Square billboard with the friend's recommendation superimposed like a review: "It's really funny. Think Jeffrey will enjoy watching."

Katie Couric

In 2010, Couric attended a dinner at Epstein's house, and afterward she thanked him, unfortunately calling the lasagna he served "ROCKIN." The following year, she wrote Siegal an email ironically thanking her for the earlier invitation, saying it had landed her in a "world of trouble." Couric has written about the dinner before, calling it "creepy," but what we learned from this release is that Siegal forwarded her "gee thanks" email to Epstein himself, using it to warn him that there was a "witch hunt going on against you and Andrew" (as in Prince Andrew).

Tony Hawk

Hawk's name came up not in an email but in an FBI tip that was included with the files. In a transcript, a tipster claimed that she was on Epstein's island, Little St. James, when Hawk was holding his wedding there. Hawk has since posted on Instagram to clarify that, of his four weddings over the years, none took place on Little St. James, though his third one was on an island and photographed by someone named Mark Epstein—no relation.

Mira Nair

Zohran Mamdani's mom in the Epstein files? Say it ain't so. Well, it's so, but it's not too terrible in the scheme of things: According to an email, the film director Nair apparently attended a party at Ghislaine Maxwell's townhouse after a film premiere in 2009. Epstein is thought not to have been in attendance. A.I. images circulating that picture Nair, Epstein, and Zohran Mamdani together have been debunked as fake.

Soon-Yin Previn

As we've already discussed, she was Chalamet's hater-in-chief, preceding Film Twitter by several years. Emails reveal that she also thought #MeToo went too far and asked Epstein for help getting her and Woody's kid into Bard. (He complied.)

J.K. Rowling

Far be it for me to defend the Harry Potter author, but it seems like her hands are clean here. She was mentioned in the files because Siegal attempted to obtain an invitation for him to attend the Broadway premiere of Harry Potter and the Cursed Child in 2018. Siegal never shared Epstein's name in the correspondence (and Epstein couldn't even get in when he showed up), so it seems like Rowling was telling the truth when she denied any involvement.

Peter Thomas Roth

A skincare guru in the Epstein files!? Yes, believe it or not: Emails reveal that in 2018, Roth sent Epstein a "care package" that included some of his moisturizer and masks. After the release of the most recent round of files, the brand posted a statement on Instagram about its namesake's appearance, explaining that Roth had known Epstein since he was a high schooler at the Dalton School, where Epstein was his teacher, and the two have stayed in touch casually over the years.

Peggy Siegal

Arguably the MVP of the Epstein files, Siegal's name has already come up a lot. A very connected publicist who frequently served as Epstein's connection to the entertainment world, Siegal is one of the all-time name-droppers in her emails, always quick to bring up the names of elites like Julianne Moore, Skip Gates, and George Lucas ... which I'm sure they're all thrilled about, because it means they're in the Epstein files because of it. In exchange for her fixing services, Epstein seems to have provided Siegal with frequent rides on his private plane and financial advice.

Jon Stewart

Like his friend Colbert, Stewart only came up tangentially, when Epstein and an associate were discussing ways to rehabilitate Woody Allen's reputation and came up with the idea of "someone like Stewart" narrating a comedy special. "Excuse me? I am offended," Stewart joked in response. "Somebody like Jon Stewart, or Jon Stewart? My point is, do I have the offer, or is this an audition?"

Martha Stewart

The lifestyle maven was in touch with Epstein several times over the years: In 2013, her assistant emailed Epstein's assistant to share Stewart's cell phone number and the dates she planned to be in St. Croix over the holidays. She was also invited to at least one dinner with Allen and Previn.

Russell Wilson

In 2019, Epstein's then-pilot floated the quarterback's name as a potential buyer for Epstein's Gulfstream G-IV private jet when it was for sale. Wilson quickly moved to quash any rumors spreading that he knew Epstein, writing last week on X, "Not TODAY satan! ... Some Random plane broker tried to sell me a plane. I had no idea whose plane and never bought the plane." Don't you just hate when that happens?
