This Labor Day weekend, not one but two Trump decendents managed to earn the internet's ire, in suspiciously similar ways. Donald Trump's daughter Ivanka Trump, presumably taking a short break from her project of transforming Albania into a luxury tourist destination, posted a video to social media of her daughter riding a horse on a gorgeous beach, which she made that much more cinematic by soundtracking it to a Coldplay song ("Viva La Vida," in case you were wondering). Elsewhere, her brother Donald Jr.'s eldest daughter, Kai Trump, shared a vlog that featured a tour of her new digs, a very un-dorm-like luxury apartment where she's hanging her hat (and golf clubs) as a freshman at the University of Miami.

In both cases, the backlash arrived swiftly, with people online and critics complaining that the Trump family lives lavishly while the rest of the country can barely afford the necessities. These objections are nothing Ivanka and Kai haven't heard before—in fact, they're utterly predictable at this point. So you have to wonder why they persist in posting things they can expect to lead to another round of outrage. In other words: Have the Trump children and grandchildren discovered rage-bait?
