Music

‘Music is the most powerful way of connecting to what’s happening’: can this album change your mind about the climate crisis?

Olive Pometsey

Tue 3 Nov 2026 14.21 GMT

Prefer the Guardian on Google

The Guardian

Personalised advertising - it's your choice

Independent, quality original journalism needs your support. Please choose an option.

Accept personalised advertising and all cookies

We use cookies and similar technologies to support the Guardian and personalise your experience in other ways. To do this we work with a cross section of 141 partners.

or

Reject all and subscribe to Guardian Ad-Lite for £5 per month

Read the Guardian website without personalised advertising. This does not include ad-free. You will still see non-personalised advertising and we may still use cookies and similar technologies to improve our site.

Some cookies are necessary to help our website work properly and can't be switched off. Find out more in our privacy policy and cookie policy, and manage the choices available to you at any time by going to ‘Privacy settings’ at the bottom of any page.

Cookies and similar technologies collect information from your device and may be used to access personal data about you including page visits and IP addresses. We use this information about you, your devices and your online interactions with us to provide, analyse and improve our services. We use cookies and similar technologies for the following purposes:

Store and/or access information on a device

Personalised advertising, advertising measurement, audience research and services development

Personalised content and content measurement

Accept all

Reject all and subscribe

If you already have Guardian Ad-Lite or read the Guardian ad-free, sign in

‘There’s an er… graph: Elliot Cooper

With globe… doing angr… an impact a…

A… th… su… B… women sing…

“She gave m… music into C… collective th… What starte… grown into a full-length album that unites female artists from around the world, including Charlotte Church, Maxine Peake and Nadine Shah. This month, members of the collective will return for Cop31, in Turkey, where they have been promoted to a slot at Global Cultural Action’s opening event.

“We are moving beyond awareness,” says Llerena. “Cop is now starting to realise the importance of art and culture to bring the climate debate forward. We can reach levels of human subjectivity that data alone cannot.”

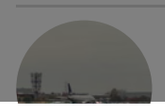

The album focuses on the common theme of water, and is co-produced by Grammy winner Jennifer Decilveo. The artists have roots in Bangladesh, Canada, the UK, India, Brazil and beyond. Shingai, vocalist and bassist for the pop-rockers Noisettes, draws from her Zimbabwean heritage, singing in Shona about the importance of environmental conservation.

Most viewed

Live
US midterm elections 2026 live: Americans go to the polls in referendum on Trump’s agenda

Live
Bulgaria confirms bomb threats against flights from