The question of "what the hell Haley Stevens is doing" remains an active topic of discussion in Michigan and around the country, but at least one theory is gaining traction: Whatever it is, it seems to have something to do with her fiancé, Jason Turkish.

Over the weekend, Stevens, who had previously endorsed Abdul El-Sayed for Senate after losing to him in August's Democratic primary, pulled a heel turn and endorsed his opponent, Republican Mike Rogers—this after Stevens spent months likening Rogers to Donald Trump and calling his agenda "extreme" and "corrupt." It also was only a few days after Turkish, who is also a Democrat, announced that he was voting for Rogers, primarily because of El-Sayed's criticisms of Israel. Stevens had been publicly critical of a pro-El-Sayed ad, but as of Friday, she was telling everyone she spoke to, including the New York Times, that she still planned to vote for him. That same day, Turkish went on TMZ, where he declared, "I don't think she's going to be supporting Abdul El-Sayed very much longer." He was right, it turns out. Cue that disastrous Anderson Cooper interview.

Turkish is a 39-year-old lawyer who specializes in disability rights. He is also Jewish and active in pro-Israel advocacy. Stevens is not Jewish, but has said she is considering converting before her and Turkish's wedding next summer. The two announced their engagement in August.

As Stevens' shocking switch-up played out over the weekend, speculation about Turkish's role in it and influence over Stevens grew. A former Michigan governor who had dinner with the couple on Friday evening told Bridget News Service that Turkish scolded Stevens right in front of him. "He was working her over. The way he was saying it was, 'Everyone is
