Lindsey Graham's Undead Sister's Opinion On Taiwan Is 'Men In Women's Sports'

Darline Graham Nordone is Lindsey Graham's sister who is not dead. And look, we are about to be mean to her, but there is a reason that if your brain surgeon keels over before your operation, nobody says, "Well why don't we see if the dead doc's sister wants to give the scalpel a whirl?" Not that Lindsey Graham was a man of such great skill, but you get the point.

In a debate this week in the Republican special primary runoff, Darline Graham, who has been appointed to fill out her dead brother's term and decided to keep on truckin', really fucked the goat. It was awkward when she said there were "50 million people" in South Carolina, for one thing.

And then there was the extremely horrifying moment when moderator Greta Van Susteren (yeah, sure, why not) asked if Taiwan is an important national security interest of the United States and if so, why. Nordone (she calls herself "Graham" for pandering purposes) responded with some embarrassing meandering bullshit about how she don't know nothin' about no national security, but she sure does support the military.

It was horrific.

"Does the United States care about Taiwan" is a question for Senate hopefuls that comes somewhere between "state your name" and "please provide the customary stool sample on the way out." We assume someone has been briefing her on what she's supposed to care about (more on that in a second) so the idea that she hasn't gotten at least a 30-second primer on "What is Taiwan?” is appalling.

And not that Lindsey Graham was any great foreign policy mind, or that his thoughts on the matter went deeper than his eternal Cialis boner to inflict pain and destruction and bombs on anybody that he perceived as looking at America funny, but foreign policy was nonetheless kind of his thing. Or at least he thought it was.

“I’m not a polished politician up here,” explained Nordone, about why she couldn’t even attempt to answer the question.

And the audience was appalled. You can hear them in the video above, gasping when she said. “I’m just gonna be honest here. I’m not on national security — I’m not — I’m not that informed on national security. So ... but I do support the military.” And that audience should have been appalled. Charlotte Clymer explains why this was such a gimme question here.

And people might say oh well bless her heart, but she didn’t know she was gonna need to be doing this. But that’s precisely the thing. South Carolina Governor Henry McMaster appointed her to keep her dead brother’s seat from going into rigor mortis, and she could have done that, while declining to run for a new term, if she doesn’t know where Taiwan is but also thinks South Carolina is America’s largest state.

If she was this unprepared — did her dead brother have an opinion on Taiwan? Pretty sure he did — then she should have said you know what? I’m sure somebody from South Carolina is more qualified to do this, like the Appalachian Trail humper guy or Trey Gowdy, or maybe Madison Cawthorn would be willing to move to South Carolina? He’s available! Literally anybody is more qualified than I am — she could have just done that, it would have been fine.

But she didn’t.
