Is Mark Carney Helping Europe (And Canada) Plan Their Escape From Abusive Spouse Trump?

Donald Trump Holds Key Meetings with Rutte Zelenskiy and al-Sharaa at NATO Summit in Ankara

And now we have read the second installment of the Wall Street Journal's excellent report about Europe's, and also Canada's, efforts to simultaneously manage Donald Trump and also chart a path toward removing themselves from the relationship. (We discussed the first installment here.)

In the second installment, which focuses on Canadian Prime Minister Mark Carney's role in shepherding Canada and Europe away from relying on the US, hopefully in a way that brings the two entities closer together, it becomes a lot clearer how managing Trump and planning the work/working the plan to extricate from the US when The Time comes are intimately linked.

It's not at all unlike an abused spouse setting up secret bank accounts and ensuring the children have a safe place to go when/if Daddy goes nuclear (literally) when he finds out.

And it brings up a thought for us, having just watched Donald Trump's latest ass-kissing session with NATO Secretary General Mark Rutte. (Trump is obviously the bottom who's receiving the ass-kissing, not the other way around.)

Rutte has a new phrase during this NATO summit, the "Trump Trillion," AKA the amount Europe and Canada have upped their defense spending in response to Trump's constant bitching and threats.

You can watch Rutte talk about it here:

Rutte said, "I could not do this without you!" Trump interrupted to bitch about Obama and Biden. "But hey, you are here now!" said Rutte, soothing the baby. "In total more than $1.2 trillion. I call this the Trump Trillion! The excess spend by Canada and [Europe]." Trump continued whining about Biden and Obama, which this time he pronounced as "Obuma," because he is obsessed with putting "U"s in words these days. "It's your win!" said Rutte, redirecting the baby.

Trump is, of course, obsessed, like a two-bit greater New York City mall developer/mafioso, with the notion that somebody is screwing him, which is always projection for those types, because they are supposed to be the ones doing the screwing. (In a flaccid MAGA brain like Trump's, there is no such thing as an arrangement where everybody wins. Their masculinity issues can't take it.)

So he's been fixated for years on the notion that Europe is screwing the US by devoting far less of its collective spending to defense compared to the US, which could have nice things if it didn't spend all its money on new bombs.

And indeed, during Trump 2.0, many of those nations really have upped their pledges! It's the Trump Trillion!

But this WSJ article today about Carney really lays out that the game here — a game that we're sure includes Rutte — is two-pronged, an effort to keep a pacifier up Trump's asshole long enough for Europe and Canada to get their affairs in order.

Makes us wonder if Rutte's "Trump Trillion" actually refers to something Trump is far too stupid and vain to understand.

The article is about Carney, but it starts when Justin Trudeau was still in power, revealing that literally batfucking shitcrazy Trump threatened in a phone call with Trudeau to fully blow up the 1908 agreement that established the US-Canadian border. "I tear that up and your whole country unravels," Trump told Trudeau.

Which led at one point to a dinner at Mar-a-Lago where people on Trudeau's team tried to redirect the baby's attention away from stealing Canada by helpfully explaining that Canada would just be a great big huge fuckin' blue state. But, the WSJ explains, "the president came up with a neat solution: just split the northern neighbor into two states, one red, the other blue."

Would it be just like American blue states, where all the population actually is, and the red state would be Alabama, we mean Alberta?

Trudeau's administration had been trying in vain to get Trump to stop babbling about the fentanyl coming from Canada by, at Jared Kushner's suggestion, making a video showing how FORD TUFF Canada is about the border. That's what got Trump so obsessed with tearing up the agreement about the border, as it turned out.

Trudeau's administration, seeing the writing on the wall, had also inquired with UK intel services about how to manage it if/when the US left Five Eyes, AKA the open intel-sharing agreement that unites the US, UK, Canada, Australia, and New Zealand. The UK at the time was like PIFFLE-ROT! because that's the accepted British word for being sceptical about leaving intelligence-sharing agreements.

So then Carney, the former head of the Bank of England and the first foreign Canadian ever to run it, comes in to office amidst all Trump's babble about Canada becoming the 51st state, and immediately HEREBY DEMANDS a review of just how tied up in Twister fuck-knots Canada and the US really are. That, of course, would serve as the beginning of a roadmap for getting out. (Sidenote of interesting trivia: The WSJ notes that on top of Carney, Emmanuel Macron used to be a banker with Rothschild, German Chancellor Friedrich Merz used to run the German arm of BlackRock, and Finnish President Alexander Stubb came from the European Investment Bank. Interesting skillset/background for a discussion of de-linking the EU and Canada from the US economically and defensively.)

The article paints an interesting picture of who's been on what side here, who's needed convincing of how serious things really are. Carney and Macron always saw eye to eye, sounds like, and Carney went to see Macron at the Élysée Palace in Paris two days after his swearing-in to discuss how to tell America, "It's not me, it's you."

Just two days after assuming office, Carney traveled not to Washington—a conventional first stop for a new Canadian prime minister—but to France. Standing alongside Macron at Paris's Élysée Palace, he called Canada "the most European of non-European countries."

Over a private lunch, the two leaders animatedly exchanged ideas on how France and Canada could help each other dial down their reliance on America. Canada had the critical minerals needed by France, whose state-backed tech firms were taking early steps into the U.S.-dominated spheres of AI and quantum computing.

French diplomats joked that since Canada and Denmark share a land border on an uninhabited Arctic island off Greenland, that could make the North American country a legitimate candidate to gain fast-track membership in the EU. Carney laughed.

Yeah, we bet he laughed. IN EUROPEAN UNION-ESE.

So Carney is seeing the writing on the wall, and has been seeing it. Meanwhile on the other side were Mark Rutte and now-outgoing UK Prime Minister Keir Starmer, who were advancing their theory that if they butter the insides of Trump's asshole frequently and lovingly enough, they can keep him onside.

It's not that the UK hasn't seen it at all. Apparently they have commissioned their own reports on how to break up with the US, and Fiona Hill, former Trump 1.0 Russia expert and impeachment witness, was a co-author. She compared Trump to Mikhail Gorbachev, "weakening a superpower he meant to strengthen." Hill does tend to have receipts on these sorts of things.
