Lindsey Halligan Now Free To Bring A Dish To Thanksgiving

We would be very surprised if unqualified idiot Lindsey Halligan is good at cooking, since she's garbage at understanding how to go "off the record" with a journalist, oh yeah, and also at all lawyer stuff. But the acting US attorney for the Eastern District of Virginia — for however long that lasts! — has suddenly had a bunch of time open up in her calendar, so if you've invited her to Thanksgiving, don't let her lie to you and say she "didn't have time" to make a side.

She has time. She has nothing to do this week, or likely any other week, at least until OAN hires her to be Matt Gaetz's stunt double.

Because a federal judge has just thrown out her indictments against both James Comey and Letitia James, for the simple reason that Halligan's own appointment was illegal.

It's a Thanksgiving miracle!

The greatest shock is that this didn't happen because of Lindsey Halligan's specific incompetence, at least not yet, though much more of that could be coming down the pike, what with motions that have been filed for vindictive prosecution, and all the bullshit that's been coming out about what a one-woman clownshow Halligan's grand jury process was.

This was about Donald Trump's incompetence, and Pam Bondi's incompetence.

"I conclude that all actions flowing from Ms. Halligan's defective appointment, including securing and signing Mr. Comey's indictment, constitute unlawful exercises of executive power and must be set aside," [US District Court Judge Cameron Currie] wrote in her opinion in the Comey case, a line that she repeated in her ruling in the James case.

The rulings from Currie — a Clinton appointee in South Carolina — explained that Comey's lawyers were correct to argue that Halligan was improperly appointed.

You can read the judge's full opinions in either or both rulings linked in that quote above, but the gist is that according to Section 546, once a Senate-confirmed US attorney has peaced out of the building, the attorney general has a total of 120 days of interim appointment authority. This started after Joe Biden's US attorney for EDVA left on inauguration day and Erik Siebert was appointed as the acting. After 120 days is over, only the judges of that district court may either allow actings to continue serving (which they did with Siebert), or make new appointments.

And guess who did not blindfold themselves, spin around a bunch of times and pin the tail on Lindsey Halligan, once Trump forced Siebert out due to his reticence to make up crimes to charge Comey and James with? That's right, the district court did not do that.

In sum, the text, structure, and history of section 546 point to one conclusion: the Attorney General's authority to appoint an interim U.S. Attorney lasts for a total of 120 days from the date she first invokes section 546 after the departure of a Senate-confirmed U.S. Attorney. If the position remains vacant at the end of the 120-day period, the exclusive authority to make further interim appointments under the statute shifts to the district court, where it remains until the President's nominee is confirmed by the Senate.

It also violated the Appointments Clause, says Currie, who considers it pretty damn cut-and-dried.
