
The Man in My Basement review – Willem Dafoe is an unsettling guest in eerie psychodrama

Published by

Peter Bradshaw

Estimated reading time

2 min

Added on

2025-10-22

Address

<https://www.theguardian.com/film/2025/sep/11/the-man-in-my-basement-review-willem-dafoe-is-an-unsettling-guest-in-eerie-psychodrama>

The Man in My Basement review – Willem Dafoe is an unsettling guest in eerie psychodrama

Feature first-timer Nadia Latif here directs a deeply strange parable, almost unlocatable in meaning and tone, adapted for the screen by Walter Mosley from his own 2004 novel. It appears to be a metaphor for racism and capitalism, for exploitation and for the historically hidden violence built into the foundations of ownership. Yet how exactly the metaphor works is unclear; it is like a labyrinth in which characters and audience can get disoriented. The final shot shows someone reading Frantz Fanon's The Wretched of the Earth. I found myself thinking of Zadie Smith's essay on Jordan Peele's Get Out in which she references Fanon's Black Skin, White Masks.

The setting is the 90s, in which half-heard stories on the TV news about Rwanda and OJ have an unstressed racial dimension. We are in Sag Harbor in New York state, a neighbourhood with strong African American community: Corey Hawkins plays a troubled black man called Charles Blakey who lives alone in a handsome but neglected house which has been in his family for eight generations. Charles nursed his late mother and uncle there, but rashly took out a loan against the property; and now, unable to get a job due to a question mark over his honesty and unable to make the mortgage repayments, he may lose this roof over his head. A local antiques expert Narciss Gully (Anna Diop) tells him his late mother's possessions might be worth a good deal, especially her collection of west African masks, but the cash could take some time. Charles needs money now.

[embedded content]

And it is at this moment that a mysterious, charmingly persuasive yet sinister white businessman called Anniston Bennet, potently played by Willem Dafoe, shows up at his door, offering him $65,000 in cash in return for renting his basement for a couple of months. Charles feels he has no choice but to agree, and to allow Mr Bennet, and his strange luggage into his home; an arrangement which is to lead to a nightmarish psychodrama.

The story feels like a supernatural horror or a ghost story, and yet doesn't conform to either. There are plenty of moments when Charles has nightmares, but the ordinary reality into which he awakes now feels like a queasy bad dream. Bennet seems to want to confront Charles in some way, to taunt him, to mock him, to exult over him – and all from a strange position of ostensible weakness, as Charles's tenant-slash-prisoner on whose money Charles is now dependent. The position of white and black is reversed. Or is it? Mr Rochester had his madwoman in the attic; Charles has his white paying guest in the basement. It's an eerie, disquieting experience.

Produced by wallabag with tcpdf

Please open an issue if you have trouble with the display of this E-Book on your device.