TV tonight: the Targaryens arrive in Game of Thrones prequel

A Knight of the Seven Kingdoms

9pm, Sky Atlantic

The lively Game of Thrones prequel is fully warmed up for action as Ser Duncan (former Irish rugby player Peter Claffey) seeks a knighthood in order to enter the tourney, with cheeky new squire Egg (Dexter Sol Ansell) in tow. When the Targaryens arrive, Duncan takes the opportunity to ask for their help. But is the dragonfire dynasty's presence about to set events on a new trajectory? Hollie Richardson

Clive Myrie's African Adventure

6.30pm, BBC Two

Twenty years ago, Clive Myrie was the BBC's Africa correspondent – and now he's back to find the Africa we rarely see on television, starting in Soweto, South Africa. After having lunch with Nelson Mandela's granddaughter Ndileka, he learns about a new sport craze – car spinning – and rides shotgun with Michelle (AKA "Jalapeno") as she does donuts. HR

Panorama: Post Office – Who's to Blame?

8pm, BBC One

There's a lingering sense that the Post Office scandal is one where the culprits will more or less get away with it; it's not even clear who the most blameworthy people are. Ahead of the public inquiry's findings, reporter Andrew Verity tries to clarify the situation by investigating some of those whose actions caused innocent postmasters to be jailed. Jack Seale

Lynley

8.30pm, BBC One

When the body of a young drug dealer is discovered, tortured and manacled "like an animal in a slaughterhouse," it leads Lynley and Havers to St Michael's church, and its halfway house ("prayer is our weapon"). But what initially appears to be a drug killing spirals into something far darker, exposing secrets, guilt and religious obsession, in the series finale. Ali Catterall

Pete Wicks: For Dogs' Sake

9pm, U&W

Pete Wicks, a big, shaggy dog of a man, is thoroughly enjoying himself in this continuing series, and his wholehearted commitment is infectious. This time, he is concentrating on a group of former racing greyhounds that need rehabilitating. Thoroughly charming. Phil Harrison

Industry

10.40pm, BBC One

Familiar faces in this week's episode, as Harper is rejoined by Eric and Sweetpea to launch a fund (and look out for more former Pierpointers). Over in Vienna, Yasmin gets close to newcomer Hayley, telling her: "I hate when men try to take something that isn't theirs." But has she also got her own

Film choice

Election (Alexander Payne, 1999), 11pm, BBC Three

Ferris Bueller (AKA actor Matthew Broderick) is all grownup in this film from the Oscar-winning director of The Holdovers, Alexander Payne. Now, instead of being a truanting pupil, he is Jim McAllister, a history and civics teacher at a Nebraska high school, but he's still no match for over-achieving pupil and Type A terror Tracy Flick. When Flick – played, in a career-defining performance, by Reese Witherspoon – runs for student president, McAllister sets out to sabotage her campaign, resulting in a sharp satire of political power-plays. Ellen E Jones
